Online Self-Praise and Self-Denigration Among the Youth in Jordan: A Socio-Pragmatic Analysis ↗

2025

Sustainable Energy, Grids and Networks (SEGAN)

This study provides a socio-pragmatic analysis of online communication among Jordanian youth, focusing on self-praise and self-denigration behaviors. It highlights cultural and social dimensions influencing digital interactions, contributing to the understanding of online identity and linguistic practices.

Roast Me, ChatGPT Humor, Identity, and Pragmatic Expectations in Jordanian Arabic AI Interactions

Ongoing Research — In Progress

This project investigates how Jordanian Arabic speakers engage with ChatGPT through humorous “roast me” prompts and how the model responds to culturally-specific humor, identity cues, and pragmatic expectations. Using a corpus of ~300 real user–AI interactions, the research explores how sarcasm, tone, and dialect are negotiated between humans and the system, and what these exchanges reveal about social perception of AI in Arabic contexts. The study draws on humor theory, pragmatics, and speech act analysis to understand how cultural identity shapes expectations of AI and how people evaluate AI responses when humor becomes a shared performance.

Scaffolding Across Cultures: A Sociocultural Analysis of Oral Corrective Feedback in Writing Centers in Jordan and the USA

Ongoing Research — In Progress

This comparative study analyzes oral corrective feedback (OCF) techniques in writing centers in Jordan and the United States through a sociocultural lens. Using participant samples of tutors and students from both countries, the research examines how cultural values shape feedback delivery, student reception, scaffolding strategies, and tutor–student interaction. The work seeks to identify where feedback practices align or diverge cross-culturally, with implications for tutor training, multilingual pedagogy, and writing center development. Findings aim to contribute to a growing need for culturally aware OCF frameworks in academic writing support contexts.
